The floodlights in the Imari National Stadium were installed more than two years ago and have broken down and remained broken ever since. The facility's sweeping pitch is awash with standing water and the field is stained and damaged by a green slime that has clung on. "The stadium has been in the news more than it needs to be," admits the director of sports in the city of Imari in the western Japan prefecture of Okayama, where the stadium is located. The Imari-based federation has put plans to build a new stadium on ice, he says, until the issue is resolved. Satellite images show the current site is no longer useable, with the water table in the surrounding area rising because of nearby salt mines, the director says. "In the spring, the moisture in the ground is absorbed and after that the water is taken up into the ground," he says. "So we lost a lot of water over the years. It is difficult to find areas that will be suitable for a new stadium." He describes the current condition as "really terrible", saying it is affecting the games as the roundabout world cup host is effectively suspended for the duration. The stadium was a major venue in the Japan national football team's unsuccessful bid to host the 2002 World Cup. Japan, defeated by eventual winners South Korea, began their 2019 campaign with a 2-1 defeat against Zambia at the Imari stadium. "It was a great disappointment that Japan didn't get to host this game," added the director. Olympic Games organisers insist the Games will go ahead as planned and there is no risk to the event, but the CEO of the Asian Games organising committee, Tadashi Aoyagi, told the Japan Times that the competition was "on hold until the venue is ready".
