Thermoforming in general is known as a process of depositing a heat-softenable material by way of film forming, molding, pressing, stamping, etching, or similar techniques on a thermoplastic or thermosetting substrate. Since the thermoplastic or thermosetting substrate is bonded to the heat-softenable material by hot pressing, the end product has high strength and is flexible even under rough conditions. Accordingly, various industrial products made by the thermoforming process have been commercialized. The uses for thermoforming are not limited to products such as films or sheets. Recently, the thermoforming technique has been applied to the manufacture of mold parts of precision electronic components such as semiconductor chips and liquid crystal substrates. Thermoforming may be performed by using a casting die, a wax die, a calender die, a vacuum die, and a solvent die. The casting die is a device having a cavity in which a molten resin is poured. The molten resin is injected into the cavity by pressure, and solidified to form a thin film. The wax die is a device having a cavity filled with a wax binder. When the wax is softened by heating, the wax binder is pressed into a mold to form a thin film. The calender die is a device including a plane anvil and a plane roll having a certain length. The plane anvil and the plane roll are pressed against each other to form a thin film through a pressing process. The vacuum die includes a vacuum chamber, a plunger inserted into the vacuum chamber, and a rod connected to the plunger. The
